“ Sometimes the solution to an aging office fit-out is in the removal of existing divisions, not the addition of new ones. Clients often believe that the desire for additional working positions rules out an open and spacious interior.

For this accounting based client, removal of unnecessary full height partitioning (previously forming odd passageways and alcoves) enabled unused space to be amalgamated, creating a central core suitable to house the required new workstations and screens. Small dividing screens create division and a feeling of privacy while mobile caddy return units provide for personal storage and additional layout space.

Glazing panels removed were able to be re-installed into those full height spaces that were retained, enabling further transmission of light through the area.”
